Welcome Letter of the President of the ISMST

@bettinagreslehner

Dear Colleagues and Friends, dear Shockwave Family,

we all suffered under the terrible pandemic the last two years, but I hope that you and your families stayed healthy in these difficult times. Since several vaccines have now received their approval and the vaccination coverage rate is very high, especially in the medical professions, I am confident that our congress can take place as a "live event". We will go ahead with the preparations under the assumption that we are able to meet in person and celebrate our meeting with a personal exchange of experiences, as we have done over the last two decades.

I look forward to welcoming you all personally to the 23rd International Congress in Vienna. Indeed, it was in Vienna that, on 14 June, 1997, our society was founded by a small group of physicians fascinated by this new technology that appeared to have such huge potential to help our patients without significant adverse side-effects or risks.

Right from the outset, we were keen to ensure that our society remained open-minded, welcoming new ideas, concepts and theories.

Most of our members were orthopaedic surgeons dealing with the 'classic' four indications: tennis elbow, heel spur, shoulder calcifications and bone non-unions. Back then, shockwave treatment was regarded as some sort of 'voodoo therapy', so our first objective was to produce evidence to gain acceptance within the 'scientific community'. And it was a long and rocky road to obtain funding for the first clinical studies to perform randomized controlled trials. Once we had demonstrated the efficacy and safety of ESWT, we became more and more interested in the working mechanism of this wonderful tool. By then, our society was attracting extremely committed researchers keen to help us understand the mechanism that underlies shockwaves.

We developed a new understanding of the way shockwaves act on biological tissue: mechano-transduction describes the fact that shockwaves (mechanical impulses such as pressure, shear and tensile forces) are translated into biological signals that activate genes. Groups of genes then start to produce proteins (growth factors, etc.) which successfully trigger regenerative processes in pathological tissue. Even the body's own stem cells can be activated to regenerate the affected area under the influence of shockwaves.

Meanwhile, interest in shockwave technology is steadily growing and spreading all over the world. So much so that the ISMST society now comprises almost 400 members from 60 countries across all continents.

Thanks to our society's open-minded approach, we were able to broaden the scope of shockwave technology from the 'classic four' to practically all disciplines of medicine. Indeed, ESWT is now used for all kinds of tendon and bone pathologies, wound healing disorders, pathologies in urology and sexual medicine, neurological pathologies such as spasticity, polyneuropathy, carpal tunnel syndrome, M. Alzheimer and muscle pathologies.

Clinical trials are underway in thoracic surgery, applying shockwaves to the open heart to stimulate heart muscle regeneration and for patients with acute spinal cord injuries, as a causal therapy to modulate initial inflammation and stimulate early nerve regeneration.

It is thanks solely to the passionate commitment of our society's members that this phenomenal development has been possible.

And so, as you prepare to travel to Vienna, I am certain that you can look forward to another exciting congress packed with all the latest insights into the fascinating field that is shockwave medicine.

Take care and stay healthy,

Wolfgang Schaden
President of the ISMST

As of 20.00 Networking Dinner

The Kunsthistorische Museum (Art Historical Museum) is located in the center of Vienna at the "Ringstrasse". Planning of the Ringstrasse began in 1857 and included the project to bring together and show the imperial collections in a grand new building featuring state-of-the-art technical and display facilities. The Emperor also enlarged the plans to create what was known as the "imperial forum". He envisaged an additional – also symmetrical – pair of buildings aligned with the two museums, each of which featured a semi-circular facade. The building's internal structure combines two architectural traditions: entrance hall, staircase and cupola hall form a dramatic unit that celebrates the imperial patron and his predecessors. An additional elegant feature is the circular opening in the ceiling of the entrance hall that offers visitors their first glimpse of the cupola hall. Ascending the stairs, visitors pass Antonio Canova's "Theseus Slaying the Centaur" on their way to the cupola hall, the apex of imperial display. Along this central axis a wealth of neo-baroque decorations create one of the most solemn and splendid interiors of late-nineteenth-century Vienna, probably unrivalled in any other European museum.

19.00 Get-Together at the “Salm-Bräu” Brewery
